Buck, a big strong dog, lived happily in a beautiful farmhouse with Judge Miller and his family. He lived in the Santa Clara Valley, near San Jose, California. The land was good in this area and famous for its fruit. Buck was a friendly dog and he loved going fishing with Judge Miller’s sons.

Life was fun, but things were about to change for Buck. The Klondike* Gold Rush* had started, and Buck would soon be part of it.

All the newspapers were talking about the Gold Rush, but of course Buck couldn’t read, so he didn’t know anything about it. He wasn’t interested in gold anyway!

The Miller family had lots of dogs, but at four years old, Buck was already boss. All the other dogs respected him and every member of the family loved him too. In summer, the Judge’s grandchildren rode on his back, while in winter he sat quietly with Judge Miller in the library in front of a warm fire, where he felt safe and loved. He often walked with the Judge’s daughters, and even swam with the boys in the pool in the garden.

Buck wasn’t fat like some pets, he loved swimming and became stronger every day. Everybody loved Buck. Unfortunately, the gold-seekers* in the north needed a dog like him. Manuel, the gardener’s helper, decided to sell Buck to make a few dollars. So, one evening, he took Buck for a walk when nobody was looking. Buck knew Manuel well and was happy to go with him. They went to the train station, where another man was waiting to give Manuel the money for Buck. The stranger put a rope* round Buck’s neck and pulled it tight. Then the man put Buck on a train. The dog was very angry and bit the man’s hand, but it was no use, he couldn’t escape.

They reached San Francisco where the man gave Buck to another stranger. By now, Buck was very thirsty and hungry. He was even too tired to fight when they cut off his collar and threw him into a wooden crate*. He couldn’t understand what was happening. “Why are they doing this to me?” he thought.

During the night, the man came to see Buck. Buck thought it was the judge, but barked* angrily when he realized it was the stranger. “Where is my master?” he thought sadly.

Next morning, four men came for the dog. They looked dangerous and Buck barked at them from inside the crate. They just laughed at him and put the crate on another train.

Buck now began a long journey which took him far from the peace and quiet of his home and the people who loved him. From the train, they moved him to a truck, then a boat, then finally a train once more. All this time, nobody gave Buck even a drink of water and he was weak and frightened.

Two days and nights passed, and Buck lay in the crate barking when anyone came near him. He was really thirsty now, and he was furious* with these men who were taking him away from everything he knew and loved. His eyes were red, he was dirty and angry, and he didn’t look like the Buck Judge Miller knew. He couldn’t wait to get out of the crate to try and bite these men. He no longer had the rope around his neck, but his throat hurt.

At last they reached Seattle, and the four men carried the crate into a small back yard* with high walls. Then, a man with a red sweater came into the back yard. He was carrying a hatchet* in one hand and a club* in the other. Buck knew he was in danger. The man hit the wooden crate with the hatchet to open it, and inside Buck pushed angrily against the breaking wood. He wanted out. He was like a wild animal, ready to attack.

“Come on then, red eyes,” said the man, as he hit the crate once more and broke it open.

Buck jumped at him with a mad look in his eyes. The man hit Buck hard with the club and the dog fell to the ground. Buck tried again, but it was no use. Each time, the man in the red sweater hit him with the club. The man continued to hit Buck until the dog lay on the ground. When Buck looked up, the man was standing over him.

“Well, Buck”, he said, “now you know who is boss. Be a good dog and you won’t have any problems.”

Then the man gave the dog some food and water. Buck had to accept that he couldn’t fight against a club and a hatchet, he realized that now. This was the first lesson he learned in this new world.

Every day, new dogs arrived, and the man in the red sweater was ready for them with his club. Sometimes men came, gave the man some money and took a dog away.

“I wonder where they are going?” thought Buck.

Then, one day, a little man who spoke French came and chose Buck. The man was Perrault and he delivered letters and parcels for the Canadian government. He needed a strong dog to pull the mail sled* and Buck was perfect for the job. The man also bought another dog called Curly. He took the two dogs to the ship, where his friend François was waiting. There were another two dogs there, and they left for the cold North. The other dogs were called Spitz and Dave. Spitz was a big white dog who tried to steal Buck’s dinner the first night. François punished Spitz, so Buck decided that this new master was a good man.

The other dog, Dave, was very quiet and wasn’t interested in Buck and Curly.

As they went north, it got colder and colder. Then, early one morning, they arrived at Dyea beach, near Skagway, in Alaska. This was where a lot of gold-seekers began their journey to the goldfields around Dawson in the Yukon, Canada.

The Klondike Gold Rush

The Klondike Region
The Klondike is a region in northwest Canada and is part of the Yukon Territory. This region has a subarctic climate, so it’s extremely cold in winter. It usually snows from September to May and the rivers are covered in ice from October till spring.

Dawson city is on the Klondike River. It became famous worldwide for the Klondike Gold Rush in 1896. At this time, the population of Dawson grew to forty thousand. Then, after the Gold Rush ended in 1899, it went back to being a small town of 8,000 people.

The Gold Rush
During the Gold Rush, between 1897 and 1899, more than 100,000 people went to the Klondike region to look for gold. Gold was discovered there for the first time in August 1896, along the Klondike River. When gold started to arrive in the ports in Northwest America, people from Seattle and San Francisco heard about it, and rushed to the region in the hope of becoming rich. Newspapers started writing about the discovery of large quantities of gold, so lots of people left their jobs to go and dig for gold. It was a long hard journey to the Klondike, and they had to cross mountain passes with heavy loads. The lucky ones discovered mines full of gold, but the majority arrived too late. The gold rush in this region lasted until 1899. Then, gold was discovered in Nome, Alaska, so everybody moved there.

Trails
Most people arrived in South-east Alaska at the ports of Dyea or Skagway (originally Skaguay). They then had to take the Chilkoot or White Pass trails to the Yukon River. At this point, they had to make themselves a boat and sail downriver to the Klondike. The Canadian government made the gold diggers bring a year’s supply of food with them. This meant they had a heavy load to carry, so it was very difficult and not everybody reached the mines.
The Chilkoot Trail

This was the most direct overland route to get to the main area of the goldfields around Dawson City and the Yukon River. It was also one of the cheapest ways to get there, so it became very popular. Those who chose the Chilkoot Trail started their journey from Dyea. This route was shorter than the others, but it was also more difficult because it was very steep.

The White Pass

This other main route left from Skagway harbor. It was longer than the Chilkoot Trail, but it wasn’t as hard. This mountain pass, which still exists today, goes through the mountains which border Alaska and Canada. It starts from Skagway, Alaska, and leads to the lakes at the headwaters of the Yukon River.
